

Building work experience for professional psychology doctorates

1. Entry requirements for professional practitioner psychology doctorates

Whether you want to progress into Clinical, Counselling, Educational, Forensic, Health, Neuro, Occupational or Sports Psychology, you will find that there will be intense competition for professional doctorate courses.

For example, in 2022 25% of applicants succeeded in gaining a place on NHS clinical psychology training (source:www.clearing-house.org.uk/). With such competition, those who are successful often have substantial experience and are persistent in making applications for several years.

Applicants for professional doctorate study will need to show evidence of a strong understanding of the profession, the role of a psychologist, and an awareness of broader issues affecting your specialist discipline of psychology.

You will normally need at least a 2:1 in a BPS accredited psychology degree and to have undertaken 'relevant work experience' in your chosen field of psychology (see section 2 below).

You will also need to show evidence of the skills and experience required specifically for that specialist area. The following links provide a general overview but check each university's entry requirements for specific details:

2. What is 'relevant experience' and how much do you need?

All courses will expect you to have some relevant experience before starting training to help you understand the role of a psychologist, the setting they work in and the people they work with. Relevant experience includes voluntary/paid, full/part time experience involving service or care roles with clients, in the public, private or voluntary sectors.

Successful applicants will commonly have gained experience in mental health, charities, nursing, social services or criminal justice.

Some courses will require experience that has been supervised by a psychologist who can supply a reference for your application. This often means working as an Assistant Psychologist and competition for these roles is high, so it is advisable to build up work experience with the client groups you are interested in working with during and after your degree. Try to gain experience in a range of settings and with a variety of client groups to broaden your experience.

Some doctorate courses will also have specific requirements for the length of time & type of experience required. For example, for entry onto a Clinical Psychology training course, 6-12 months of the following clinical work experience is typically required:

- Experience of paid or voluntary work in a clinical, community or clinical-academic setting exposing the person to client groups and service settings directly relevant to clinical psychology.
- This experience can be gained in a range of contexts including NHS or University settings, the voluntary sector, or organisations affiliated to the NHS. It follows that a variety of pre-training roles would be relevant, including (but not restricted to) Assistant Psychologist, Research Assistant, Graduate Primary Care Worker, Nursing Assistant, and Healthcare Assistant.

You will need to demonstrate what you have learnt from your experiences both personally and professionally. Your ability to relate what you have learnt from work experience to underpinning psychological theories will be essential both at application and interview stages.
